

launched against American business executives, political leaders, and the general population.

Despite the overwhelming documentation which has been made public throughout Europe, exposing terrorism as surrogate warfare created, run, and funded by British Secret Intelligence Services (SIS) and Israeli Shin Beth intelligence teams, in conjunction with "black nobility" intelligence networks, the participants of the CII convention were assured by these "experts" that all terrorism originates from training schools in East Germany, Libya, Cuba, and China. One participant noted that they were told that no such thing as right-wing terrorism existed; terrorism was all set up and controlled by the "left."

The source of the formulation of this line, carefully tailored to "fit" the profile of U.S. terrorist activations, has been traced back to a special meeting held in England by John Grant's Institute for Professional Investigators last May. The featured speakers at this strategy session were Peter Hamilton, security director for Chubb and Sons Insurance Company; Fred Rayne, president of Rayne International Inc., a U.S.-based private security firm which specializes in executive security — Rayne himself is a former British Intelligence and foreign service officer — plus two British private security terrorism specialists, Vince Cannatu and John Savage.

A central institution in this entire executive security disinformation campaign can be clearly identified as the Institute for Professional Investigators. The IPI was established three years ago in England under a commission from Queen Elizabeth II, specifically to draw together terrorism "specialists" from the British civil and military police forces, government police and intelligence agencies, and forensic and insurance investigators. Other notable operatives in the IPS's 300-member roster, besides John Grant, include Brig. Michael Mathews, chief of the British Army Military Police; Peter Frost, the director of studies for the British Home Office College, one of the centers out of which the Northern Ireland "gang-counter-gang" terrorism is run; and Professor Derrick McClintock, chairman of the Criminology Department at the University of Edinburgh, a long-time base of operations for British intelligence campaigns and terrorist deployments.

Additionally, the Institute is preparing to expand into Canada, with outlets in Montreal and Ottawa being negotiated, to facilitate the Institute's ability to "educate" private investigators and executive security personnel for the entire North American continent, and gain greater control over the entire U.S. terrorism apparatus.

John Grant: 'Transnational Terrorism'

Exclusive to the Executive Intelligence Review

Made available to Executive Intelligence Review by a Chicago reporter are the following excerpts of an interview with terrorist-controller John Grant, head of the Institute for Professional Investigators in England.

I found John Grant happy to talk about the problem of terrorism to an interested reporter. "It would be silly to think that the coming wave of terrorism in the U.S. will be smaller than in Europe... on the contrary, it will be much bigger," Grant started out. "Terrorists are idealists, they are not afraid to die. You come up against somebody who is not afraid to die and you are in trouble." On being questioned about the kind of targets terrorists would choose in the U.S., Grant suggested that physical targets would include nuclear power plants and water supply reservoirs; in terms of individuals, he continued, "anyone is a target these days, not just executives. Any employee, the man on the street, they are all targets. These are psychotics... and you know I am an expert and I'll tell you something; you can't stop anyone who is willing to die. You can just make it difficult for them."

The terrorists themselves, Grant said, "are transnational. They interchange much the same guns, for instance: the IRA gets its guns from the PLO, Czechoslovakia, and the Japanese Red Army. The guns come from Cuba, China, Russia, Morocco, Libya, Algeria, etc... Although security procedures at United States airports and seaports is good," Grant went on, "there are long land borders between the U.S. and Canada and Mexico, making it impossible to keep out the terrorists."

I asked when and what kind of terrorism he foresaw coming to the U.S., to which Grant replied that the shootout in Philadelphia between police and the MOVE cult were a "national signal for all terrorist groups to start hitting."

"The hits can happen at any time," he stressed. "All will occur at about the same time, anywhere. In many cases the underground press will signal the operation."

"Terrorism can only be leftwing," he said. "Right-wing terrorists are actually controlled by the left-wingers..." But he pointed out that having right-wing terrorists is actually helpful for the public because "left complements right, and they will fight against each other rather than attack the general public" in these cases.
