

must be taken seriously.”

On Oct. 28, Rutherford had published a half-page op-ed titled, “The End of the Special Relationship,” advising Britain to develop a “new European identity” as a “counterweight” to the United States in NATO, since “what is questionable is how far Europe can support what appears to be an ideological crusade against the Soviet Union. . . . The time for bilateral relations, or special relations, with the U.S., is gone. . . . Successive British governments have been living in a fools’ paradise in looking to Washington first, and Europe second. In future, it should be the other way around.”

In the Times of London on the same day, David Watt, head of the Royal Institute of International Affairs (RIIA) in London, warned shrilly that “The U.S. government could easily embroil its unwilling partners in a Third World War without any consultation whatever. . . . Europe as a whole certainly has an overpowering interest in Third World stability and in restraining the U.S. from rash ventures to promote it—whether in the Caribbean, the Middle East, or in Africa.” On the eve of this piece, the RIIA had hosted Georgii Arbatov, head of Moscow’s U.S.A.-Canada Institute, for a policy speech attacking the United States in characteristic lying Soviet fashion.

And, on Oct. 7, Watt had issued a bitter editorial attack against what he called the “Churchill posture” in British politics, the belief that Soviet policy today is identical in essential features to Nazi policy in 1938-39. Watt termed people who believe this—in which category he placed Ronald Reagan, U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, and Mrs. Thatcher herself—“wretched.”

The aborted Churchill reflex

That article signaled the escalation of a process which had been given no attention in the press: the systematic purge or demotion within British policymaking milieux of individuals belonging to what might be called “the Churchill faction” in current British politics. These individuals are distinguished by their strong support for a close American-British alliance under perceived pre-world war strategic conditions, and by their specific support of President Reagan’s March 23 commitment to rapid U.S. development of directed energy-beam antiballistic missile systems. Starting in August, several members of this grouping found themselves on the “outs,” either jobless or ignored in the strategic deliberations of the day.

In the wake of Mrs. Thatcher’s mammoth spring 1983

Would NATO survive Lord Carrington?

The man who may be momentarily named to replace NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns is Lord Peter Carrington, the former British Foreign Secretary who with his business partner Henry Kissinger has long advocated negotiating a “New Yalta” deal with the Soviet Union. The bottom line of this “New Yalta” would be slashing U.S. “spheres of influence.”

At the time of the Malvinas crisis, Lyndon LaRouche warned in an April 27, 1982 EIR piece titled “Britain’s ‘NATO Pullout’ Bluff Could Be Called,” that Great Britain had blackmailed Washington with the threat that:

“1) The United Kingdom will withdraw from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), allegedly thereby destroying NATO;

“2) If Washington opposes London on the matter of British military action against Argentina, Western Europe will drift into the arms of Moscow. . . .

“Such a humiliation of the United States would be fully consistent with the ‘third way’ policy to which Lord Carrington’s machinations were recently dedicated. Carington’s ‘third way’ policy prescribed a significant withdrawal of Western Europe from the pre-existing form of SHAPE and related agreements and institutions. The thermonuclear alliance with the United States was to be continued, but the European components of the Atlantic Alliance, including France, were to be realigned under British leadership as a third force maneuvering between Washington and Moscow. The Socialist International and Libya’s Colonel Qaddafi are exemplary of the principal accomplices of Carrington et al. In recent deployments to this purpose, the transatlantic ‘peace movement’ is among the tactics deployed in aid of such a development.

“So, if Britain threatens to break up the NATO alliance, and threatens a more detached role of Western Europe, maneuvering between the two superpowers, Britain is threatening to do what it has been working to accomplish in any case.”

That this remains Lord Carrington’s policy was confirmed in the Alastair Buchan Memorial Lecture Lord Carrington gave before Denis Healey’s International Institute for Strategic Studies, a speech reprinted in the July issue of NATO Review.

“There is no longer any doubt about the decline of the East and of the Soviet Empire. Moscow is a decaying Byzantium. But this decay will take place over decades rather than months or years.” In the interim, the “Soviet Union has built up an awesome military machine and electoral victory, supporters of the Churchill post-1938 legacy had hoped to maneuver Mrs. Thatcher into mobilizing Britain around a sense of purpose, in preparation for confronting the vastly worsening threat posed by the Soviet leadership and strengthening the relationship with the United States through alignment with President Reagan's defense policy.

Now it seems that these hopes have been smashed. As one Conservative Party strategist bitterly commented to EIR Oct. 31: "Mrs. Thatcher has made a complete ass of herself. She doesn't know what's going on in the world, she's adopted a very childish attitude. Her commitment to a strong defense of the free world stops at her mouth. She's a British-European domestic politician, and the world situation is alien to her."

'The greengrocer's daughter'

It should be noted that in Britain, ideas and strategies that matter in terms of everyday life only come from the top and filter their way down. Churchill could speak from and for the Establishment itself, conveying power and a sense of strategic mission. The middle-class Thatcher is viewed as "only the greengrocer's daughter."

As a scion of the British aristocracy, Churchill had more shown that she is prepared to use it. She still has the means and motivation to project her power into large areas of the world. . . .

"My conclusion is not that we can afford to be generous in Geneva. But I am saying that these talks should be conducted in an atmosphere of calm confidence and that the broader political dimension of East/West relations should be constantly at the forefront of the Western mind."

As NATO Secretary General, Lord Carrington would pursue "peaceful resolution of potential conflict through energetic and forceful dialogue. The notion that we should face the Russians down in a silent war of nerves, broken only by bursts of megaphone diplomacy, is based on a misconception of our own values, of Soviet behaviour. . . . I am not preaching a return to détente pure and simple. Détente was never pure and simple anyway—though I confess I find it hard to understand how both sides can have lost by it. . . . We need something less sentimental and less divisive than détente."

Lord Carrington concludes: "The truth is that, over the years, we have got into the habit of leaving ultimate decisions, and ultimate responsibilities, to the Americans. . . . Over the past few years we have developed a new political consciousness in Europe, through the mechanisms of political cooperation. We now need to build, equally cautiously, but equally purposefully, a European security consciousness too."

than his share of cultisms, Malthusian obsessions, fascist leanings, and (especially in his earlier life) strategic inanities. But when a significant portion of the Establishment itself, including members of the Astor Family's Cliveden Set, concluded that its own survival was threatened by Adolf Hitler, the policies of Chamberlain were brushed aside, and Churchill was able to mobilize a sense of historic purpose, a type of "British nationalism." At his best, he channeled frontier scientific developments as they applied to military questions for the defense of the United Kingdom.

This latter quality is described in the 1978 book Most Secret War by Prof. R. V. Jones, chief of British Scientific Intelligence during World War Two and the man who, in the face of great resistance within Britain itself, broke the secrets of the German air-navigation systems (the famous "Battle of the Beams") and thereby undermined German plans for mass bombing of the United Kingdom. Speaking of Churchill, Jones writes: "Had there been no Nazi movement, his posthumous reputation might have been at best a matter of dispute. But, now [1940] that the hour had come he was uniquely matched to its demands. . . . Alone among politicians, he valued science and technology as something approaching their true worth, at least in military application."

Jones adds that Churchill brought together "a sense of history and a feeling of destiny. . . . In speech after speech he helped the people of Britain to see where they stood in history, he convinced them that the direction at the centre was now both firm and good, and he called from them their supreme effort."

Under Mrs. Thatcher, in contrast, Britain is undergoing demontage. Monetarist austerity has not only dictated big cuts in fundamental services, but, ironically, dangerous cuts as well in defense capabilities against the Russian threat (see EIR, Nov. 1).

The intensity of the industrial dismantling suggests that factions in the Establishment has made the short-term decision to pick up their bags and go elsewhere, perhaps to the far reaches of Canada or Australia, to escape from the coming strategic confrontations, and leave Britain itself to go to seed, until such time as they calculate they can up-end the Russian bear by some covert means. One London economic expert estimates that since Mrs. Thatcher came to power in 1978, as much as $200 billion in capital may have fled Britain, due to reduced income taxes for the rich and ending of exchange controls.

Under actual conditions of nuclear war, of course, there is no distant sanctuary. One can only estimate that the escapism of the Establishment actually signifies that they do not yet "feel" the strategic crisis in terms that are threatening enough to their own survival. The only hope for Britain is that under conditions of worsening crisis, a decisive number of Establishment members will become scared enough to recognize the reality principle at least as much as Churchill did.
