

3) The conditions in Georgia, verging on civil war, combined with the potential for fighting to resume between Georgia and the two regions that have seceded from Georgia, Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

4) The more than 10-year-old Kurdish insurrection in eastern and southeastern Turkey, which has cost more than 20,000 lives, covers all of Turkey's northeastern and eastern provinces bordering on Armenia and Iran, and the entire southeast quadrant of Turkey extending inland from Turkey's borders with Iraq and Syria. The war has ruined the physical economy of about one-quarter of Anatolia. The economic and social cost to Turkey has been far higher. The war has caused a flood of millions of homeless Kurds out of eastern Turkey and into the main cities of Turkey, including Istanbul, Izmir, and Ankara, where they live in squalor in shantytowns called gecekondus—"towns of the night."

The longer the conflict in eastern Turkey lasts, the greater the danger that the next theater of conflict will erupt, namely the hellish scenario—unfortunately all too real—of communal warfare in the cities of western Turkey. A foretaste of how volatile this situation is, was seen in Istanbul in March, with the bloody riots and clashes with police staged by Turkey's Alawite Islamic minority group.

The Kurdish conflict is not only strategically important because it wreaks havoc with Turkey's—and thus Europe's—overland links to Iraq and Iran and points farther east. The headwaters of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, which are the largest freshwater reserves for the Near East region, are located in eastern Anatolia. As London knows only too well, destroying eastern Anatolia deprives the entire Near East of the most important resource required for real economic development: water.

5) The addition of northern Iraq to the "Thirty Years' War" map. The Turkish operation was justified, but unfortunately, the incursion into northern Iraq also forms a trap for Turkey. The problem lies in the "rules of the game" at the higher level being controlled or manipulated by London. As long as the post-Persian Gulf war stranglehold placed on Iraq by Margaret Thatcher and George Bush still holds, northern Iraq cannot be pacified.

This example of the higher level of the problem illustrates that a workable solution to the entire array of conflicts in this zone and elsewhere is only possible through overturning the policies of the western governments of the Thatcher-Bush era that allowed these conflicts to be sparked in the first place. The starting point for this must come from the Clinton administration, and it must come soon. Otherwise, the level and scope of conflict and chaos in the area that geographically bridges Europe and Russia with the Near East and South Asia threatens to grow to a dimension that would make it all but irreversible, drawing other nations and regions into its vortex.

Holbrooke backs Turkish operations in Iraq

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke gave a press conference on March 31, following his meetings with Turkish Prime Minister Tansu Ciller's political adviser Emre Gonensay. In contrast to harsh condemnations made by the British, French, and German governments, Holbrooke fully supported Turkey's incursion into Iraq, and the importance of U.S. support for Turkey generally. Britain, France, and Germany have accused Turkey of human rights violations, have cut off arms sales to Turkey, and have threatened to veto Turkey's proposed admittance into the European Union customs union this year. French President François Mitterrand's wife, Danielle, traveled to Washington in March to denounce the Turkish incursion before the U.S. Congress as constituting genocide.

"Turkey, while it was already a front-line state during the Cold War in the sense that there was a common Turkish-Soviet border, has increasingly become the front-line state for the United States," Holbrooke told the press.

"Look at the issues of the region and consider how many of them impact directly on Turkey and on whom Turkey impacts directly. . . . Nagorno-Karabakh, Chechnya, Iran, Iraq, Cyprus, problems in the Aegean, Bosnia all have a direct effect on Turkey. . . . In addition, there are other tensions in the area which do not directly involve Turkey but can affect them—Greece-Albanian relations, relations between Athens and Skopje, and the situation between Russia and Ukraine because of the Crimea.

"Turkey is critical to the security and stability of Europe. And when I say stability and security of Europe, I include our own stability and security, because we are a European power and it matters to us. . . .

"Currently the Turks have launched a military operation in northern Iraq inside the no-fly zone. We believe that their efforts to deal with the PKK [Kurdish Workers Party] are legitimate and their territorial integrity is critically important, not only of them but all of Europe, because I can tell you clearly that if the territorial integrity of the current boundaries of Europe, no matter what historical accidents created them, is changed, it will lead to chaos throughout the region. . . . At the same time, we have expressed our concern that these operations be limited in scope and duration."
