

Since When Is Genocide Philanthropic?

In May 2009, a collection of the world's wealthiest men and women met behind closed doors at the President's House at Rockefeller University in New York City to chart out a merger of all of their combined philanthropic efforts. Seated around the elegant table were the billionaire hosts—David Rockefeller, Warren Buffett, and Bill Gates—and the invited guests, including Ted Turner, George Soros, Oprah Winfrey, Peter Peterson, Julian Robertson, Eli Broad, and then-New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg. All told, their net worth passed $130 billion.

At the initiative of Bill and Melinda Gates and Warren Buffett, the group pledged to direct all of their so-called “philanthropic activities” toward a single cause. According to news leaks from the meeting, and a subsequent series of similar meetings held around the United States, the group decided to pool their vast wealth to promote Malthusian population reduction. Media mogul Ted Turner, one of the more outspoken members of the multi-billionaires club, openly called for a 100-year period of family planning to impose a global one-child policy. At the end of the century, the world's population would be reduced to no more than 2 billion people. Not coincidentally, the same objective of mass population reduction has been the avowed commitment of the British royal family. The Royal Consort, Prince Philip, co-founder with Prince Bernhard of The Netherlands (now deceased) of the Malthusian World Wildlife Fund, has expressed his wish to be reincarnated as a deadly virus to contribute to the cause of population reduction.

As you will have read elsewhere in this issue of EIR, Buffett and Gates are at the center of the promotion of fracking, an oil-and-gas extraction scheme that has been a mighty cause of the depletion of the water supplies of the United States, Canada, and Mexico, west of the Mississippi River. We have now reached a point where the combination of fracking, drought, and the diversion of corn and other food for biofuels has created a food crisis that is soon to erupt as an existential crisis. For many, food-price hyperinflation will make it impossible to provide for their families. Eventually the food will simply not be there.

Is it a coincidence that Warren Buffett, the self-professed Olympian god of Omaha, who has devoted his philanthropic energies to population reduction, is behind the fracking swindle that threatens mass food shortages and starvation as early as this year?

Add to the mix the fact that another member of the mega-billionaires club, George Soros, has dedicated his “philanthropic” activities to the legalization of mind-destroying drugs—another form of genocide, which also happens to be a Federal crime. Does a picture emerge from this admittedly quick course in modern philanthropy?

Back in the 1940s, some Members of Congress raised flags over the abuse of Federal tax codes, permitting super-rich individuals to conduct subversive activities under the guise of tax-exempt charitable activity. Today's frackers and dope legalizers certainly fit the profile. Their overt commitment to radical population reduction as a “cause” befitting privileged tax relief boggles the mind.

By our standards, the promotion and execution of mass genocide is no charity. Genocide is genocide and should be called for what it is—a crime against humanity.
