

ings in Washington. The arrangements were finalized days before the fighting escalated, through the talks held in the Azerbaidzhani capital of Baku between Secretary of State James Baker and Azerbaidzhan President Mutalibov. In the phony piety typical of the Bush administration, Baker said that Washington would recognize Azerbaidzhan on condition that it "respect human rights." On Feb. 19, as Stepanakert was being bombarded, the Bush administration granted unconditional recognition to Azerbaidzhan.

The pretext concocted for an overt threat of a Turkish military intervention against Armenia came on the heels of a phony news story planted by Azerbaidzhan, that "ex-Soviet," i.e., Russian, units based in Azerbaidzhan had joined Armenian forces in attacking Azerbaidzhani positions. The story was quickly proven to be a pure invention.

The position of the Russian military was presented Feb. 18 in a Moscow press conference by Commander in Chief of CIS forces Marshal Yevgeni Shaposhnikov. Shaposhnikov proposed a CIS peacekeeping force, but only under conditions of an effective cease-fire, where the CIS forces would separate the armed forces of both sides. Shaposhnikov insisted that only such a presence of CIS forces could prevent a general "blood-bath" from ensuing. However, he warned that his forces have no intention of becoming involved in the cross-fire of war, and should that danger arise, he personally will insist that all CIS forces be withdrawn from combat regions.

The Shaposhnikov proposals were coordinated with a Feb. 17 announcement by Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev inviting Armenian and Azeri officials to Moscow for talks under his mediation on Feb. 20, to try and settle the conflict. The foreign ministers of both Armenia and Azerbaidzhan arrived in Moscow, and the talks commenced on schedule. However, a Russian attempt to upgrade the talks to summit level and thus improve chances for some modest success, failed. The offer was immediately accepted by Armenia, and Armenian President Levon Ter-Petrosian turned up in Moscow with the Armenian delegation. Azerbaidzhan President Mutalibov, however, refused to attend.

'Save Armenia,' says Schiller Institute

Helga Zepp-LaRouche, president of the Schiller Institute in Germany, issued a call entitled "Armenia Must Not Be a Forgotten Country!" on Feb. 14.

It is a tragic absurdity: Just at the moment when Armenia and Azerbaidzhan become full members of the CSCE, the international community of nations tolerates the brutal escalation of military assaults on Nagorno-Karabakh. If the territory and the independence of Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh are not immediately provided effective protection, another holocaust threatens Armenia.

The collapse of the Soviet empire, the disintegration of Yugoslavia, and the deep depression in the Anglo-American part of the world are clear symptoms of the fact that the system of Versailles, and its redefinition after World War II in the Yalta agreements and the Bretton Woods system, is at an end.

But the forces of Versailles and Yalta do not give up so quickly, and they are willing to repeat the mistakes which led to two world wars in this century in order to preserve their own power. They are now attempting to deny the right of people to national sovereignty and self-determination, and they are ready to sacrifice entire nations to the dictates of their imperialist schemes.

Armenia has been the victim of this dynamic for some four months now, without world public opinion even wanting to admit it. President Ter-Petrosian has appealed to all governments, but these governments have not even thought it necessary to reply.

Meanwhile, provision of the most basic necessities for the population has become catastrophic. People are living on bread and water, fuel is scarce because of the blockade, and homes are cold. There is no milk for children and, as always, elderly people and families with many children are the hardest hit. All shipments of aid bypass Armenia. The republics of the Community of Independent States are preoccupied with their own affairs, leaving the Azeri aggressor a free hand.

We appeal to the governments of the CSCE, to the parliaments, and the population to meet the following urgent demands:

1) Immediate and full recognition of the right to self-determination of Armenia and Nagorno-Karabakh.

2) An international mobilization of food, medicine, and other aid for the suffering population.

3) Immediate realization of the program for European infrastructure, as proposed by the economist Lyndon LaRouche, based on the "Paris-Berlin-Vienna Productive Triangle," in connection with development programs for the Transcaucasus, the only possibility for a lasting peace in this region. . . . Europe must bring the International Monetary Fund to an end . . . or something as bad as the two world wars of this century will happen again. . . . Our only alternative is to return to the policies of Alexander Hamilton and Friedrich List.

We appeal to governments, parliamentarians, and involved people the world over to join the mobilization of the Schiller Institute for these demands.

Help save Armenia from an impending holocaust!
